Q: How to open gvim from an Xterm For some reason it is quite difficult to find a solution to this problem. I don't have X on my desktop (I'm using linux). When I launch a Xterm, I can open vim. I launch gvim with the following command: `gvim -f -c $VIMRUNTIME` Why does gvim start vim instead of gvim? There is a similar post on this website but the solution doesn't work for me. Help? A: From the gnome-terminal manpage (with emphasis mine): Using GVIM The GNOME Terminal daemon normally starts GVIM in a child process. The command-line options `gvimrc`, `swank_fancy` and `swank_dyn_load` are ignored by the terminal daemon, and GVIM starts normally. To override this behavior, create a startup script, eg `gvimrc`, and place that in `~/.gnomerc`: The script has to be sourced, so that the environment variables are set, eg: `. ~/.gnomerc` Source the script with `gnome-terminal --login --login-window`. With the above startup script GVIM starts with command-line option `-f` and no additional command-line options. Without `gnome-terminal --login --login-window`, all command-line options are ignored, and a full "GUI" version is run. You can check whether that startup file is indeed read with the command: `gnome-terminal -e "echo $VIMRUNTIME"` Non-mammalian central nervous system development: from basic mechanisms to diseases. The development of the central nervous system is traditionally viewed as occurring only in vertebrates and undergoing five main phases. The dramatic changes that occur in these phases has been traced back to the evolution of the brain from a 'simple' organ in early fish to a highly complex organ with well-defined patterns and functions in human. However, recent studies from a number of model organisms provide evidence for an earlier, non-mammalian development of the central nervous system. This article reviews the development of the brain in vertebrates and in invertebrates, with a focus on fish, insects, amphibians, and non-mammalian

[9] Next, the trial court noted that the Guidelines were advisory. The trial court acknowledged that Wilson has strong ties to his family. It noted that Wilson was young, had served in the military, and had a good work history. The trial court discussed Wilson's drug use, illegal possession of a firearm, and the need to rehabilitate Wilson and protect society. It noted that Wilson had expressed an interest in working while incarcerated. The trial court acknowledged that it had considered the effect and weight of certain aggravating factors that had been alleged, weighed the evidence, and made the factual findings necessary to impose the maximum sentence available. [10] At the time of his sentencing hearing, Wilson did not object to the sentence imposed by the trial court. Generally, a sentencing error is waived when no objection is made at the time of sentencing. Ferrell v. State, 10 N.E.3d 1259, 1262 (Ind. 2014). Under Ind.
