Q: How to prevent copying of a file on the SD card? My Android application receives large amounts of data and save it to the SD card. This data is not compressible, so it has to be saved in the original format. However, the problem is that the user can copy the file by mistake or even my app itself. I do not want that. How to prevent it? A: You can add a permission on your manifest to prevent applications on your Android device from copying your app files: Read more about it here: What is the difference between the samba file share and the AP (domain login) file share? When does Samba start? 4 Replies When you log on to the AP server, you will first be prompted for a username and password. You will have the opportunity to select one of the user accounts that you already have on the AP server. If you have two or more user accounts on the AP server, you will be prompted for two different user names and passwords (again). If you have set a password for a user account on the AP server, that password will be the same as the password that you have on the Samba server. The AP authentication subsystem will then prompt you for a user name and password to authenticate you to that account. This is true even if the Samba server and AP server are on different computer systems, with different users. The only downside to this configuration is that you do not receive the same account information in the "passwd" utility when you change the password of a user account on the Samba server. You will be prompted to change the password for that account on the Samba server only. You will still be prompted for a user
