What's new in Harpoon Cat:

apult The Harpoon missile system was developed by the United States Navy and consisted of four missiles, a launcher, a radar system, an interceptor aircraft, and a handler for the four missiles. Description The system was first fielded by the United States Navy during the 1960s and served on numerous warships. Harpoon missiles were used extensively as anti-ship and anti-land attack weapons. One striking development was the Harpoon's ability to guide a homing in on incoming targets as the interceptor approached. A single ship may carry as many as four Harpoon anti-ship missiles, usually two to port and two to starboard. Ships may carry a single Harpoon launcher that can fire up to eight missiles. Each missile includes a motor that propels it to a speed of 600 mph. The mechanism in the missile is weighted so that if the missile misses it will drop to the water, re-enter the atmosphere, and when it lands nose up, it can still detonate as close as 50 meters of the target. Operational history Prior to deployment on the, Harpoon missiles were flown by the Fighting Squadron Five of the United States Navy Reserve as well as the Weapons Systems Officer of destroyers USS Compton (DD-945), and USS Cowpens (DD-928) as part of Exercise "Ike routine" in 1968. Harpoon missiles were flown by F-4E Phantom aircraft of VFA-74 flying out of NAS Quonset Point, Rhode Island. Later they were flown by F-4C Wild Weasel aircraft out of NAS New Castle, Delaware. In the summer of 1970 the fighter detachment at NAS New Castle was replaced with Harpoon missiles flown by a Wild Weasel aircraft out of NAS Oceana, Virginia. In the early 1970s USS Essex used Harpoons against North Vietnamese gunboats. The destroyer was sometimes able to have three Harpoons simultaneously available for action. On 27 October 1975, during a gunbattle between Vietnamese People's Navy (NVA) gunboats and the US destroyer and her crew during the Fall of Saigon, Harpoon missiles fired by LPH-1 suffered mechanical failures, were damaged, either through a hot surface strike, or through a high-velocity strike from shore-based guns of the Vietnamese navy, which fired at the U.S. ship due to its firing on NVA vessels. In the late 1970s, the US Navy
