Downloads longman dictionary download free full version pdf to wordinstmank.. longman dictionary download free full version pdf to wordinstmank A: Wow, this is a big wall of code. I went over it quickly but I would suggest simplifying things. You mention you're a programmer, so you might benefit from learning C. It would be best to start by creating a much simpler program, and then work from that. You're using C++ classes, which means that the following is all C++ and not C: unsigned char *s = (unsigned char *)malloc(512); unsigned char *p = malloc(16); Instead, you should just use the C library functions (not things specific to C++): unsigned char *s = malloc(512); unsigned char *p = malloc(16); Note that the C library does not include a function to fill memory with zeros, so you should fill the memory yourself with memset(): memset(s, '\0', 512); Now, once you have those variables, it's time to parse the string. A decent API will let you do this quickly: ifstream infile(filename.c_str(), ios::in); infile >> s >> p; This function will also do validation that s was filled with a C-style null terminated string, and that p was filled with 16 bytes. Now you want to do the same for your dictionary: ifstream infile(filename.c_str(), ios::in); infile >> dictionary; The function will again validate that the file you opened was correctly opened, and then validate that the string is null terminated (this is good because you need to guarantee that there are no spaces in your dictionary). Finally, it will fill the array with words from the file. You can use C++ to take the results and verify that the words are separated by spaces. If you have C++11 support, this can be done with streams: // Convert to std::string for easier parsing auto str = std::string(dictionary); // Words are separated by spaces std::regex rx(".{1,}"); auto matches = std::sregex_iterator(str.begin(), str.end
