However, don't expect any surprises this year. Despite the fact that China has been silent since mid-December, the world expects the country's leadership to soon announce plans for more vigorous trade-war measures. It's likely that the first retaliatory move will come via steel or aluminum tariffs. Taken together, the U.S. and China represent the world's two largest consumers of raw materials. A rise in Chinese steel imports, for example, could have a global impact. Is this expected? In the past, trade wars have been short-lived. However, a conflict of this magnitude is not expected to be as short-lived, so the full range of options is likely to be on the table for the next few months. What happens if China chooses to respond this way? When China reverts to a more protectionist policy, it will almost certainly trigger countermeasures from the U.S. In January, Trump may impose duties on another $200 billion worth of Chinese goods. The retaliation would largely target the Chinese steel industry. But its consequences would extend to other sectors, such as tech and machinery. Why? Aside from the U.S. and China, many of the other nations to which the Trump administration will target its steel and aluminum tariffs are also major global buyers of those raw materials. Think about it like this: If the 6d1f23a050
