So the process is: Let's say for example that you have two copies of Firefox. Do both urls bring you to Firefox's homepage? Yes, because the redirect requests are processed by the browser itself. However, it'll be handled differently depending on what browser is used. The difference will be that, using Firefox, a redirected request will pass through the browser's built-in browser cache. However, in some cases, if that Firefox is not installed, you can use the browser's cache like a proxy, even though the two addresses are served by the same server. Both servers will have cached the URL, but Firefox will cache the URL as separate lines, and then redirect it to the new URL. Chrome will make one URL, but will not cache it, so it'll cache two lines: the original, and the URL with the new domain. And since one of the two URLs is cached, and one isn't, it'll load the 'non-cached' one instead. So, I'd recommend just serving one URL to everyone. If it happens to be a cached version, it'll be cached for everyone, but if you only want to cache a portion of the site's resources, then it's good to cache those. Another way to serve a single URL is to just set an Expires header in the response. So, for example, you could be serving this page: This page will be cached c6a93da74d
